Each flash cell stores one or more bits of information. A flash cell is typically programmed as a single bit per cell (SBC) or a multi-bit per cell (MBC) memory. The size of a single bit can vary based on the geometry of the memory cell. In general, the voltage threshold of the cell is read by coupling the cell to a reference voltage source, which may be biased at a specific level. If the level of the voltage source is above the threshold voltage of the cell, the cell conducts. If the level of the voltage source is below the threshold voltage of the cell, the cell does not conduct. In some flash memories, an operating voltage is provided to the cells of the memory array. The cell voltage threshold is programmed and read by ramping the voltage of the operating voltage source from a low reference voltage, such as ground, to a high voltage, such as one-half of a power supply voltage, $VCC/2$. MBC flash memories may be constructed using memory cells formed by integration of
