The result is unprecedented 3D player animations that are indistinguishable from a complete, physical game of football. HyperMotion Technology is a big change from FIFA 21, and we wanted to share with you some of the data we have collected to show you the results of the new technology. HyperMotion Technology gives Football its authenticity back. The impact of the technology can be seen in movement data collected from players playing a FIFA Ultimate Team match as well. We recorded motion capture data for all 22 players, which was then saved to disk using the new in-game motion capture recording and playback system. You will now be able to relive these gameplay sessions in the game as well as simulate yourself playing, which we're going to discuss later in this article.

Tactics & Balancing

One of the defining characteristics of the FIFA series since its inception has been the introduction of new tactics, often in response to a new set of rules or new gameplay styles that were starting to emerge. FIFA 22 is no exception, and we took the opportunity to define new and revised tactics as well. This is not to say that some tactics no longer exist, and some have simply been revised. Let's look at some of the changes and additions to tactics that we have made in the latest update.

Defensive 4-2-3-1

In FIFA 21 we changed our default tactics to a 4-2-3-1 formation, but gave players the ability to play in a 4-3-3 formation if they prefer the number and positions of the outfield players. This meant that the new 4-2-3-1 formation couldn't be used in every team, and was only suitable for those teams that had sufficient numbers in the midfield. FIFA 22 provides additional options for tactics. If you have a player that likes to play as a midfielder (and who doesn't?), you can switch the positioning of the central midfielder player to DM and play a more traditional Defensive-Midfielder-Wingers-DM-Attack-Midfielder-Wingers-DM-Attack formation. Additionally, the attacker or wingers in FIFA 22 can be set to play higher up the pitch and take on a different role as a target man. We have named these roles as Defensives and Winger Defensives. FIFA 22 also changes the default styles of play for teams in the tournament mode.
