At a minimum, Photoshop is a great way to edit photographs. You can make fine adjustments to color and tones, while also using Photoshop's layer-based compositing features to combine multiple layers to create effects that can be lightened or darkened, changed in hue, or tinted. You can also use this software to create collages of multiple images, and then you can add filters and special effects to create unique artistic images. When people say they like photoshop, they usually mean they like doing what it can do. But it doesn't do everything, and it can often do strange things to the image — especially when the image is an animation. Read the entire book before you spend your time on this software. Photoshop has no one standard interface. Photoshop Suite editions (often called CS or CS5.5) use a ribbon-based interface, and Elements editions use a thumbnail-based interface. You can switch between the two using the toolbar at the top of the screen (Figure 1-1). Figure 1-1: Photoshop has many ways to bring out the best in an image. @Michael, I'd agree with you that a leather brush would probably work better than a Wacom tablet. I've not tried it but I agree the side buttons look a lot more classy than the scrolly ones on the Wacom tablets. I don't think you'd get the best of both worlds. The right button is better for the middle finger whereas the right side one is useful for the ring finger, whereas the scrolly one is suited for the left hand side. If you spend a lot of time in portrait orientation, you may consider a new tablet. Are you able to switch the orientation from portrait to landscape? As I do a lot of web design, it is better to keep things in portrait orientation in order to make things look easier to read, as I have a wide-screen monitor and don't want to have it stretched vertically. I'll probably just keep the tablet, though, and use the side buttons for my cursor, and the scrolly one for right/left wheeling.John Clement John Clement, (September 13, 1889 – October 21, 1972), was a Canadian ice hockey executive and sports administrator.
